

PERMANENT AVAILABILITY FOR MARRIAGE:

CONSIDERATIONS OF THE CANADIAN CASE

ABSTRACT

The permanent availability model (PAM) of the family is an ideal type of family organization based on the premise that every adult in a society is permanently available to be a marriage mate for every other cross-sex adult, regardless of his or her current marital status. This ideal type is discussed with reference to its antithesis, the orderly replacement model (ORM). It is suggested that all family systems can be ordered on a continuum ranging from ORM to PAM and that changes in the Canadian family system can heuristically be interpreted as a movement towards the PAM. Supporting data involving changes in attitudes, legal reforms, and changes in behaviours are presented for six integrants of the model: 1) increasingly reversible marriage; 2) singular identities for married persons; 3) emphasis on bilateral descent; 4) increasing heterogamy; 5) declining fertility; and 6) increasing economic independence. The predisposition towards serial monogamy is discussed in terms of complicating factors such as unbalanced sex ratios and AIDS, of redefinitions of eligibles, and of divorce decision making. Implications of these trends for the immediate future include increased fragility of marriage and a general individuation of society.
